Memories in Ash

Claire Rosslyn Wilson

They arrived on boats, as people always had.
Boredom, sickness and expectations clung to walls stowaways that hid in suitcases for months while mouths lingered with stories to last a winter.

At the other end on beaches, they burnt memories photos had no chance to fade, incensed faces were too far committed to turn back now. Smoke ghosts filled the first days as passengers disembarked to a sequence of precautions and processes.

And so they waited, faces floated in water reflecting a repetition of emotions sometimes there, sometimes not, screens held up to the outside world soon engulfed in a sun that flattened their sights and gave them headaches. They had time to collect conversations while they waited for attention.

In drying winds their hopes ran in circles, clothes beaten clean grew thinner each time and the silk faded when held too long to the light.
